This is a history of the use of intelligence of a variety of types in war. The main thesis is that human intelligence (spying, espionage, etc.) is usually associated with intelligence but that the most important forms of intelligence are actually based on electronic surveillance and code decryption. This is a fine and interesting point.

Intelligence in War: Knowledge of the Enemy from Napoleon ...

John Keegan's 2003 "Intelligence in War" is a well-written, if limited, survey of several battles and campaigns to determine what if any impact intelligence had on their outcome. Keegan cites Admiral Lord Nelson's pursuit of Napoleon's fleet, Stonewall Jackson's famous Valley campaign, and the World War II battles of Crete, Midway, and the North Atlantic, among others.

Intelligence in War : Knowledge of the Enemy from Napoleon ...

Intelligence in War is an interesting collection of vignettes, some about battles and campaigns and others about intelligence work. The problem comes when Keegan tries to mold the two subjects into a larger synthesis. Keegan's thesis is that, for command, intelligence is marginal. It can help, but it "does not point out unerringly the path to ...

Without our knowledge of Ultra and Magic, it would be impossible to write the war's history; and, indeed, all history of the war written before 1974, when the Ultra secret was revealed for the first time, is flawed by reason of that gap. 1 However restrained the claims made for the influence of Ultra in bringing eventual victory—and those made by its official historian, F. H. Hinsley, are ...

Intelligence in War: Knowledge of the Enemy from Napoleon

INTELLIGENCE IN WAR is full of historical examples in which the gathering of information played a role in the outcome of a battle or campaign. John Keegan seems to take the position that intelligence-gathering, in and of itself, is not a war-winning (or even battle-winning) weapon, and that many factors play into whether a military contest is won or lost, which is a theme in some of his other ...

Intelligence in War: The value--and limitations--of what ...

Intelligence matters in peacetime and in war, and is not an optional discipline that a commander can make do without. Tactical and operational knowledge is a standard for which J2s and S2s alike strive, and are what has led the United States to make great strides in battlefield awareness, information dominance, and other ISR platforms and doctrines.
